Simple Steps for Healthy Living

The European Union is widely advertising the connection between certain diseases and the (31).....people live. Fortunately, the message is gradually (32)..... understood. In a recent survey, 89% of people knew of the dangers of smoking, which is responsible (33).....a third of all cancer deaths. Many people are also aware (34) the risks of increased exposure (35)..... the sun.

However, many people do not know that other aspects of (36)..... behaviour can also influence the risk of getting cancer. One of the most interesting pieces of research was carried (37)..... in Italy, where Europe's leading cancer experts stressed the importance of nutrition.

It showed that a high consumption of fat and meat and a low one of fruit and vegetables (38)..... increase the rate of disease in various (39)..... of the body.

While doctors are confident (40) eating a lot of fruit and vegetables helps protect (41)..... several common cancers, they do not know exactly (42)..... that is. The most popular belief is that the substances found in (43)..... foods react with the "free radicals" found in our bodies help to slow down the growth of disease.

Until more research has been (44)....., it is recommended that the (45).....we can do is to follow a healthy diet and lifestyle

A RETURN TO COMPETITION

„So, are you ready for this?” my trainer asked me as I stepped forward towards the mat. This was my first gymnastics competition in nearly six months, and even though I'd been doing well in practice, I was not convinced my recently hurt wrist would support me when I was dealing with nerves at the same time. “I know you can do it?” he added.

I turned to him and smiled. "I know I can do it too. But my wrist...!"

"Just remember, every part of your body supports the others. Forget about the parts – think about the whole. You're going to be amazing!" As I stepped onto the mat, I just hoped he was right.

- A. stress might cause a new injury.
- B. practice has not made her fully ready to compete.
- C. emotional and physical factors might affect her performance.

THE LIMITS OF BEING PERFECT?

In the world of elite skill sports like gymnastics, what we expect athletes to be able to do keeps changing. What was considered perfect a decade or two ago is nothing special nowadays. And when extraordinary athletes like gymnast Simone Biles come onto scene, the challenges for others become even greater. My question is, are we hurting young athletes' minds and bodies by expecting them to do things which seemed impossible a few years ago? That remains to be seen, but it is fascinating to watch young athletes try to reach new levels of skill.

62. In general, the writer

- A. is complaining about how much we expect athletes to do.
- B. is interested in seeing how young athletes deal with new challenges.
- C. is criticizing the system for being harmful to young athletes.

PEDAL POWER TV TO UPROOT COUCH POTATO

A television set that will only work if children pedal an exercise bicycle to provide the electricity has been invented by researchers examining weight problems at a New York hospital.

Experiments involving overweight children aged between eight and twelve showed that those who had to pedal when they wanted to watch their favourite programmes not only watched far less television, but also recorded impressive loss of fat.

The 'couch potato TV' was developed by researchers at St Luke's Roosevelt Hospital as a result of growing concern over weight problems among an increasing number of American children. David Allison, who headed the research said: "I am not naïve enough to think we're going to solve the world's weight problems with TVs hooked to bicycles. But there are other things we could do that are not only limited by our imaginations."

Mr Allison once proposed that people should be charged to travel in lifts in an effort to encourage them to use the stairs. He said that 13% of American children were considered seriously overweight, and that the number was growing. During the tests children who had the 'couch potato TV sets' watched on average one hour of television a week, while children in a second 'control' group watched more than twenty hours.

THE ART OF LIVING IN STYLE:CONVERTED PACES AND OLDER PLACES LEND STYLE TO STUDENT LIVING

Before you go to the nearest Huge Apartment Megaplex to find your living pace for the next semester, let it be known that there are alternatives. With a little patience and time to search around Tuscon's historic downtown and university areas, you may be able to find an older residence that makes up in style what it lacks in modern convenience, a place that had been many, many things before it became a place for you to call home.

Lauren Benz and her four roommates live in Studio Apartments, in the mostly commercial downtown area. Their loft-style apartment, which has been a graphic design studio and a recording studio, has a few problems other apartments don't. There is no heating system, no central cooling system, no residential garbage service, no mail service and no parking. But the benefits of living in their apartment are numerous. The open architecture has allowed the roommates to host parties with up to 600 guests, with space left over to allow bands to perform.

Henry Electric Apartments is another converted space. A former electric store opened in 1935, the building was divided into four separate apartments two years ago.

The contractors that renovated the building left the original, polished, concrete floors, while installing industrial-looking steel walls to the main room and recycled pool tiles to the bathroom. They also left the original Henry Electric sign out front, which can invite some confused visitors to the property. Residents have come out of their bedrooms to find elderly men browsing through their belongings, looking for electrical supplies.

Rincon Apartments, located on North Sixth Avenue and East University Boulevard, are older apartments that boast the kind of early 20th century architecture one won't find in brand new places. 'It's the very first apartment building built in Tuscon. It was built in 1908,' said owner and manager Margaret Sokser. 'The historic building has seventeen units in it,' she said, noting that over the years, there has been a fair mix of student and non-student residents. Each apartment has wooden floors, high ceilings and a fireplace.

Another apartment building in the university area, the Castle Apartments, on the corner of North Euclid Avenue and East Adam Street, was a hospital, tuberculosis sanitarium, nursing home, convent and vacation lodge before becoming an apartment building. The building, which was originally built in 1906, has thirty-two apartments and is mostly occupied by upperclassmen and graduate students, according to owner Kathy Busch. Castle resident Becky Blacher said living in a small complex owned by one person instead of a company made it possible for her to have an art show there, "Kathy was really excited," she said about talking to her landlord in preparation for the show. "She's so cool. What other landlord would let you put holes in cement walls?" Blacher said.
